DADDY

Last year, my dad's pine cone-collecting obsession intensified.
I notice him eyeing my stash with envy.
On his birthday, I give him a reusable shopping bag filled with dried cones and he conceals his delight beneath a conceit of condescension but, resolute, I am unruffled.
They pale against broad-chested, huge-shoulder decades, hugs
that affirm sense of place, the surety of fatherly faith,
but I have gifted him another hour of warmth
just at this time when he needs it.
As tired knees yawn, and sleep beckons.
As time lengthens and slows,
races ahead.
